Q: What's the difference between simple-html-dom's `getHtml()` and `html()` I'm trying to convert a big html file to xml, and found that simple-html-dom's `getHtml()` and `html()` has the same effect. I want to know: What's the difference between them? Why the name "`getHtml()`"? Thank you!

A: According to the documentation: `getHtml()` is identical to `html()`, except that it will not traverse the whole document (this is the default setting) See the documentation for more: A: Both of them reads the HTML source and returns the data in the form of a DOM document and it will not step through each node to get the attributes and value. I guess `getHtml()` is named like that because the simplest html representation will be returned, without step by step inspection of the HTML source code. The `html()` function takes the argument `-no-filter` to get the same DOM document, without using any internal caching mechanism. For your data, that doesn't matter much I guess, but it is helpful to know that if you need the DOM document step by step, you have to use the `getHtml()` function and not the `html()` one. Aurora is a good book to read. It takes you on the journey of a young girl named Aurora, who is from Colorado, trying to figure out what she wants to do with her life. It takes you on the journey of a young girl, who is trying to figure out what she wants to do with her life. Aurora ends up at college, and she still is searching for the real meaning of life. Some of the things that Aurora end up dealing with are the struggle of a black girl trying to fit in at a white school, wanting to be a writer, and knowing that she is a lesbian. The book takes you on the journey of someone searching for answers to what life has to offer. The book is written from a first person perspective, making it more intimate. It shows how
