I read nearly every one of his books. I read the entire Sandman series, and I think that one of my favorite things about the series is that it actually ends. No more Sandman! It was a wonderful ride, but it was done. The best stories are ones that have a big culmination that you can look back on and say "that was... awesome!". That doesn't always apply to long running franchises, however. We get "American Gods" and "Alice in Wonderland" and "The Wall" but how awesome does "American Gods" really feel? I think it still has a ways to go before it matches the awesomeness of the first few books, but we're actually reaching the end. Similarly, the first seasons of "Game of Thrones" were really good, but towards the end I think it started to get a bit too bogged down in politics and plotting. Which isn't a problem if the show is about politics and plotting but it often wasn't. The show itself still has a long future, but Game of Thrones doesn't... which is a shame. I feel like Gaiman is in a similar position. I think that his Sandman series is really good, and that he does a wonderful job of writing fantasy with a wonderful sense of levity. I think the difference is that Gaiman does not seem to be consciously aware of his end game. I see a huge road to the end of Sandman, which is still amazing but I'm not so sure it will be as mind bending or as intriguing as he is writing it.
