A majority of US adults think prayer at school should be allowed, an Associated Press-NORC Center for Public Affairs Research poll shows. Eight in 10 Americans said they thought prayer should be allowed at school, while 64 percent said it should not. A record number of adults said their children were subject to prayer at school. The nation's school prayer issues will be on the minds of Americans as the Supreme Court takes up the controversial issue of whether student-led prayer is allowed in public schools. ADVERTISEMENT A decade ago, the court banned prayer before school board meetings and legislative sessions. Eleven states responded by either passing laws mandating prayer or permitting it in school. The poll shows that support for school prayer has grown steadily over the last several years. The margin of error is 3.4 percentage points. "Americans' strong opposition to school-sponsored prayer in the 1990s has since given way to a more mixed and neutral position on the issue," said Robert Jones, a sociology professor at University of Oklahoma who has studied the issue for nearly 30 years. "Americans are comfortable with prayer in their own lives, as with other expressive activities like proselytizing and picketing," Jones said. ADVERTISEMENT "In contrast to public opinion, law continues to declare prayer unconstitutional at schools, despite the Supreme Court's refusal to reconsider the subject," he said. In 2005, the latest year for which figures are available, the court ruled 5 to 4 in a case brought by the Americans United for Separation of Church and State against a prayer by an official at the Texas State Board of Education. Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote the majority opinion, which stood as a victory for the First Amendment's prohibition of government-sponsored prayer in public school settings. ADVERTISEMENT "The prohibition on state-sponsored prayer has roots that are deep in our nation's history," Kennedy wrote. "We pause today to remember that the overwhelming majority of our ancestors understood and practiced a separation of church and state as a matter of course." He wrote that prayer represents "certainly a lawful mode of engaging in political dialogue." ADVERTISEMENT But the court's ruling did not explicitly say that prayer at public schools is constitutional, as the Texas official's lawsuit sought to have the court declare.
