Security threats can be an extremely serious problem especially with every day users who might be using software that has an unknown flaw and causes them to be infected by a virus. Multiple methods of security breaches can be available to us, and while the most common is usually malicious software, it also includes the Hackers. A Hack occurs when a computer is "hacked", making it possible for someone to illegally access and obtain information in the computer. This information can range from the data that's stored in the computer to other personal information such as a person's Social Security Number or credit card numbers. Information that's stolen may include information that wasn't supposed to be there in the first place such as family photos, embarrassing e-mails, and even credit card details. These malicious software can range from viruses that allow hackers to intercept data being sent to a printer, to Trojans that can monitor a computer over a period of time. A Trojan is a software program that can be installed onto a computer and it can be triggered by malicious software in order to gain control of the system's information. Trojans can steal a computer's data, or even create multiple programs to monitor and steal data from the computer. Although Trojans are considered low level threats to your computer, they can be a serious threat if you happen to share and use your computers for work or play purposes. Commonly installed Trojans include KeRanger, Sticky Password, Backdoor.TruGate, and many more. This type of threat or breach can also be prevented by using some of the most secure windows security software.
