You can read the in-depth thoughts they had about the game here: How to go about self training users? I am helping a client set up an eCommerce site for his business. We have been busy doing most of the site set up for the last three weeks, and it's pretty much done. What we have left is that the client would like me to manage most of the site's content. I have all of the templates for the site already, but I'm still kind of scratching my head about what I should do. For example, I could set up a content management system and have him post his content into the system, but that's a lot of work on my end to make it work well. I could set up a Google site where he posts his content and then I can put it into the site, but that's a lot of work on my end and there's also the issue that he can't edit his posts in the content management system. The site was built using WordPress, and the content management system is WP Engine. If it's any help, he is about to buy a PPC advertising package and so he might be interested in doing something similar to that. He has done some for himself, but he has no idea what he's doing, so he didn't really want to do any of that. He is also pretty computer illiterate,
