As the shit hits the proverbial fan, it is a time of change, as changes are made the British railway is about to go through the biggest transformation in its history with the introduction of the Class 66. The Siemens-built locomotives, the most common passenger train stock in the UK today and therefore also the most common freight stock, will be re-engineered to provide improved fuel efficiency, improved emission control and even more powerful locomotives than ever before. If you're looking to take on the new job hunting or have just found yourself without a job, the UK currently remains the richest country in the world by a significant margin - for now, with the introduction of the Class 66 still a few years away you can still experience the freedom of the rail, which is something that very few people can these days

Haven't you got as sick as I have of playing games in which you shoot at everything that moves and die a death on the slightest provocation? Did we not create life together and now we need to destroy each other as some kind of perverse, incomprehensible penance? Having nothing to do with humanity, I have determined that I will only play games that make me feel fine, that might even make me happy, but that are not designed to infuriate me or despoil my spirit. This game has succeeded in finding that balance. When I'm on to win mode, I'm feeling pretty good. That doesn't mean that the rest of the time I don't feel fear. I feel fear, I feel pain and misery, and sometimes I'm even afraid of what might happen when I enter the ship. I'm sure there are a lot of people who feel the same way. When you play a certain game for long periods of time, you inevitably start to feel like a product, like a product being sold. You start to feel that you belong in a cage somewhere, that you deserve to be locked away for the rest of your life. That might sound a bit exaggerated, but I don't have a choice. I'm locked up. I'm locked up in my own mind, but the truth is, I can see the bars. And they make my blood boil. So what do I do? I jump out of the cage. I run through the barbed wire. Then I turn around and look back at the cage. Then I think I'll close the door. Well, it is no secret that I have a problem with games with a goal. I am a goal-oriented person, and I think that having a goal or a certain target makes everything else so much easier. I prefer games with objectives and with lots of things to do. But that doesn't mean that I haven't had a lot of time to think about how I feel about this game. It's not good. I mean, it's good. It's super good, actually, but it's not good because it's about that feeling you get in the end when you look at the wall of the cage, all the pain you've been suffering, all the disappointment you've been feeling. I haven't been able to do anything with it. I don't know how to. I really don't. I don't have the courage to play it. I don't have the courage to go on because that part of me wants

: The US Army's Cannibal Army by Lieutenant William M. Ricks On the morning of March 16, 1925, the men of the US Army's 130th Infantry Regiment were standing in formation and waiting. Some were rested, but most were thirsty and hungry and looking forward to some much-needed breakfast and company. Actually, no one was in a real hurry. During the wait, the men of Company B sat in their foxholes and played cards or otherwise passed the time. About 0900 hours, the order to fall out was given. That would be the last day any of the men of the 130th would ever eat with their proper entitlements and rank. Sometime between that day and the morning of March 18, they had all been killed. At least 145 enlisted men and 40 enlisted women had been consumed, cooked up and then served to one another in this desolate no-man's-land in the Mexican desert. Tonight, probably shortly before midnight, the truth will finally come out. Someone will come forward and describe what transpired during that unspeakable day and night. But this is that someone. The many hours spent in dark positions, watching as time and the weather took its toll, have left his hands scarred by cuts from sharp pieces of wood and sticks. Those hands have met the mouth of that cannibal army many times. For six days, the remains of the 130th Infantry Regiment were treated as if they were living American patriots. They were buried where they lay. They were cemeteries for far more than just the men themselves. Seventy miles to the south and east, at the nearby Pancho Villa camp, were men whose interrogation would spill the details of the murders committed by the men of the 130th Infantry under their command. The attack on the campground began four hours after the 132nd and 130th Infantry regiments started falling out on March 16; Villa's men were unaware that they would find Pancho Villa's army captured, but eventually their ears caught the transfer of wounded from Mexican field hospitals to a dazed and emaciated American Army medical unit. Most of the depredations and atrocities committed by the men of the 130th Infantry are no more than horrific yet self-explanatory details. How many of the men were wounded, shot in the legs or arms and then they, too, were taken by the marauding force. Others had more
