I have several accounts and I'm trying to get the last couple digits of all the accounts. I have 6 accounts and they all have the same exact ending. I want to take each account name and append the ending onto that name. So I created this function: $Accounts = Import-Csv C:\Users\Me\Desktop\Users.csv function Get-Accounts { $Accounts | Where-Object {$_.AccountType -eq "Office"} | Sort-Object Account -Descending | ForEach-Object { $Account = $_.account $account.AccountType = $_.AccountType $account.AccountNumber = $_.AccountNumber } } The problem is that it's only putting the last account number in the array. Here's a sample of the csv file: "accounts": [{ "account": "1234123", "accounttype": "Office", "accountnumber": "123456" }, { "account": "1234512", "accounttype": "Office", "accountnumber": "123456" }, { "account": "1234513", "accounttype": "Office", "accountnumber": "123456" }] A: If you are reading this with Import-Csv, you should get a nicer data object. For example: [PSCustomObject][ordered]@{account=1234512;AccountType=Office;AccountNumber=123456} So you can filter

The invention is particularly applicable to the detection of nuclear particles in uranium-bearing liquids and will be described with particular reference thereto; however, as will become apparent, the invention has broader applications. The existence of nuclear particles in liquids has been established as one of the contributing factors to deterioration in the performance of the primary fluid coolant systems of nuclear reactors. There is no reliable method for directly measuring nuclear particles in liquids.

Other methods of detection include radioisotope measurements, neutron flux measurements, and chemical separation methods. Current technology for detecting nuclear particles in liquids use cumbersome, slow, and expensive systems. Current systems require that the liquid be filtered to remove any solid material and then be chemically separated. In addition, particles of a nuclear nature are so small that they are not readily detectable by the known separation techniques. Various detectors for nuclear particles in liquids are described in the following U.S. Patents:
