This paper presents a general system architecture for human body parts localization and mapping using an RGB-D camera, along with a classification procedure for different kinds of human body parts. It describes how to achieve all three steps by means of a single camera. The first step defines an input model of the human body and recognizes the hand-crafted human body parts in each frame from a single RGB-D camera. Once the input model has been registered with the camera coordinate system, the different human body parts could be localized and mapped in a 3D environment. Afterward, the second step is used to perform multi-modal semantic segmentation for each hand-crafted human body part. The result of the registration is considered as the initial point for the segmentation. The third step is the use of RGB-D features that come from the input model and the segmentation results to map each hand-crafted human body part with a human skeleton in 3D environment. Experiments show that the proposed system works well for various body parts such as hand, feet, face, etc., with an average precision of 96.18%, 90.40%, and 77.58%, respectively. The experiments also show the robustness of the proposed system for various RGB-D camera settings in terms of both accuracy and efficiency.As a foraging bee, you are the eyes of the hive, in other words you are her senses.
