Yes, it could be said that a college degree can sometimes make a person more "employable," in the sense that we have a better chance of getting a good job. But what about a post-graduate degree? If a college degree can (sometimes) make you more employable, what about a master's or a Ph.D.? Isn't that even more valuable? Not really, says a new study in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences. Here's the gist of the authors' argument: A person's future earnings depend more on the combination of their education and their skills than on their specific education or their specific skills. There are four very specific skills that are more important in determining a person's earnings
