Anti-piracy group anti-piracy group RIAA has filed a lawsuit against file sharing website Grokster for copyright infringement. The lawsuit, to be filed Tuesday in the Northern District of California, claims that the company's peer-to-peer software is "per se illegal." According to the RIAA, Grokster's peer-to-peer software is equivalent to Napster. This will be the second lawsuit RIAA has brought against Grokster this year, with a pending case against the company over the same alleged copyright violations. Previously, last month the RIAA claimed that a new version of Grokster's software took on the name "Podcaster" and was being used to distribute ringtones and MP3s of songs. As with the previous lawsuit, the new suit will ask a judge to order Grokster to install "a system that would block users from downloading copyright infringing files using its software," as the RIAA put it. The lawsuit also takes on the company's most recent version of its peer-to-peer software, Grokster 2.4 for Windows, which the RIAA claims is the product Grokster distributors are selling at the moment. "Grokster continues to make frequent and troubling moves designed to appeal to teenagers and casual pirates," said Cary Sherman, chairman of the RIAA. "It continues to view it as legitimate to breach the licensing obligations that govern consumers to sell DRM-protected and unlicensed copies of content." Some of Grokster's current supporters are ready to get angry. "This is what I'm talking about. Somebody in Hollywood is trying to sue my neighbor or me or someone else, the person that uses Grokster - to shut them down," wrote former Grokster user David Cullen. "This is the RIAA trying to make us all criminals. It is a failure of the RIAA that they can't get this totally legal technology shut down by themselves." Cullen also reported feeling the heat of the RIAA, c6a93da74d
