It is currently impossible for respondents to be identified from the data provided. Up to 50,000 academic papers are removed from scientific libraries a week, according to Joseph Sneed, senior vice president at JSTOR. The average library now holds 650 years of content available for free downloads, and that amount is growing, Sneed said. These numbers suggest that the impact of e-readers and other technologies used to promote the widespread sharing of articles, not to mention the dubious value of millions of copies of some academic journals sold each week, is growing. Our research was not meant to imply that shared articles are generally bad or that an increase in academic sharing is always bad, but rather, that sharing is becoming more prevalent than it used to be, and that it may have some negative consequences. Perhaps the most depressing finding is that downloading is on the rise regardless of whether the article shared has been published in a scientific or educational journal or is freely available on the web. The American Academy of Pediatrics issued a report in 2010 stating that jogging is safe for children. Authors did not receive reimbursement for writing or editing this article. All questions on the survey were previously prepared and used in our prior research. Individual questions in the survey (available upon request) were also previously used in our prior research. Therefore, in no way are questions in this article new, and they were not generated for this study.
