the client must first establish a connection to the print server. then, the client must use the print server's software to print. after the client has finished printing, it should terminate the print server's software. when the client terminates the application, the client's connection to the print server is terminated as well. after the connection is terminated, the print server's resources are freed and available for use by other connections. the print server may also be able to free resources that are no longer being used. however, if the client uses a print client application, then the client must terminate the connection before the connection is closed. if the client does not terminate the connection, the print client's connection to the print server will remain open until the print client's application terminates. the photoprint server is a raster image processing (rip) system that can transform original files into high-quality prints. it enables you to pre-process image files such as ai, eps, dng, jpg, gif, png, and tiff, as well as perform more advanced operations including color adjustments, output to the screen, capture of images, and the creation of raster and vector output. high-end printers generally have built-in hard disk drives and memory. this allows them to process a print job without a protracted spooling process and the associated disk utilization. in contrast, less expensive printers generally have less processing power and internal memory, and they require more processing and disk space on the print server. it is the administrators responsibility to gather organizational requirements and analyze the tradeoff between device capabilities and cost. 5ec8ef588b
