Although there is strong evidence of a positive effect on bone mass of adjuvant treatment of premenopausal breast cancer patients, the combination of specific treatments to bone health remains uncertain. Pre- and post-menopausal women treated or not with adjuvant treatment (tamoxifen against plus ovarian estrogen) for breast cancer and healthy age-matched controls were assessed with dual-energy X-ray absorptiometry and biochemical markers of bone turnover. In parallel, these mineral content (BMC) and density (BMD) were evaluated with a Hologic QDR 2000 at the lumbar spine and femoral neck. Subjects of bone turnover included control and cancer (premenopausal) (N=100) and age-matched controls (100). Data were analyzed with general linear models. In the adjuvant group (n = 22), pre- and post-menopausal women were treated with adjuvant hormonal therapy and were compared with age-matched healthy controls (n = 22). In the adjuvant group, weight gain, as differences were found between pre- and post-menopausal patients for both spine sites or BMC, and BMD at any skeletal site, with or without hormonal therapy. QDR and BMD were not related to the type of treatment. Treated patients with breast cancer and healthy controls had a similar BMC, and BMD at all skeletal sites, except a slight decrease of BMC at the hip in the untreated controls, although this difference was no longer significant when adjusted for body mass index. The current study did not reveal an adverse effect of adjuvant hormonal therapy on bone mass in premenopausal women with breast cancer, although a subtle decrease in BMC at the hip could be detected in
