Lightroom organizes your images in the user interface into libraries, which you can arrange in virtually any order you like. You can also create folders and subfolders inside of these libraries for more organizational convenience. The problem is that when you import your images into Lightroom, they are basically copied into your main library, which means you will likely end up with multiple copies of every single image. Truth be told, Lightroom doesn't really care about keeping your images' location in the file system organized. All of it is indexed on the hard drive. What this means is that if you delete the image in the folder in which you imported it, it will remain in the library but in the wrong place. Every image you import are cloned into the library, so you will have duplicates. The duplicates not only eat up hard disk space, but they also cause performance issues, because Lightroom has to duplicate the image and reindex it in the database as well as update the location. Now, you can certainly find and delete these duplicate images when you do an Export, which will delete them from the file system while moving old duplicates out of the main library. If you are clever, you can even rearrange the libraries, hiding duplicates behind images you want to be deleted so that Lightroom will only delete the original. It is impressive how much time Adobe puts into optimization but you still have to watch out for these kinds of issues. Overall, I'd say that Lightroom is pretty much okay, but it is definitely a beta product. Some things need to be rewritten to get more out of its multi-core CPU.
